It isn't shown to tantalize, this midwinter picture of Doris Kenyon. It was taken at her brother's Adirondack home, where she stayed while making "The Great White Trail" film, soon to be released in New York. Incidentally, being a daring young huntress, 'tis said she captured, while there, the pelt for this coat and hood.

Five-year-old Kenneth Hughes, of Saginaw, Mich., proud recipient of a medal for service in obtaining army recruits. The presentation took place at the Midday Minute Men's recruiting station, at 57 Chambers Street, after which Kenneth, from the top of a piano, made a patriotic and much cheered speech.

To the right—Elisabeth Risdon, as Kate in George Loane Tucker's photodramatic version of "The Manxman," by Hall Caine, being shown at the Criterion Theatre.

Declining the aid of an anxious rescue party, the Misses Alice and Lillian Sullivan, of New York, after a fearsome climb over the rocks above the famous Bow River falls, in the Canadian Rockies, returned to solid, unslippery ground, alone and unharmed. Members of the Alpine Club at Banff Springs consider this one of the most perilous climbs in the country.
