"Stop! Look! and Listen!"—a supply railway crossing in the trenches. The Belgian soldier doing duty as a gateman has placarded the intersection with danger signs in five languages.

A really remarkable aeroplane view of a French gas attack in progress over an extended section of the Flanders front. The photograph taken from a considerable height gives one a splendid idea of the magnitude and fearfulness of such an attack.

Administering the last rites to a mortally wounded Belgian soldier. This man has just been brought in from the firing line to this front line dressing station.

To the left—Old German shelter in the front line trenches, extending many feet underground. These are the dugouts from which the Boches must be driven by "bombers" before being occupied by the "consolidating" troops. That this section of the trench has been under fire is shown by the condition of the trees at the top of the picture.

To the left are shown two views of a French engineer carrying his full equipment. This poilu has been decorated for bravery in action. Note the extra pair of hobnail boots strapped to his shoulders. How far could you march loaded down like this?

German prisoners somewhere back of the Marne front. A double fencing of barbed wire, between which is heaped loose coils of the same, keeps these prisoners of France safe within the enclosure. The two Boches in the photograph are apparently getting ready to cook a meal.
