

The American Ambulance in France

The pictures on this page are all of the American Ambulance Hospital at Neuilly, France. For three years it has been in control of a committee of college men and women, society workers and prominent people. It is now in the hands of the American Red Cross. The wonderful work of this institution has attracted world-wide attention and won the undying gratitude of all French people. On the left: A group of young American volunteer ambulance drivers of the Field Service staff. Their mascot has lined up with them for his picture, too. International Film.

This wounded French soldier, with both arms and legs fractured, is but one of the many that American surgeons and nurses are bringing back to health. Many of the patent devices seen in the picture are those of Dr. Alexis Carrel. International Film.

A call has been made for volunteer ambulance drivers to go to the front, and this inspiring picture shows how our American boys answer it. Kodak & Herbert.
