

AMONG US MORTALS

The Monday Morning Train Back to Camp

Drawn by W. E. HILL

"And when will the war be over, do you think?" Private Sluggs, on his second week in the draft army and very much on his dignity, is expected to have inside dope on all war matters.

Although there are no officers in sight, Private Goggin is taking no chances, and obliges with a little camouflage while a friend takes a bracer.

Captain Bump overhears two privates—who had no idea, of course, that an officer was sitting in back of them—commenting on the intelligence, kindness and princely qualities of the camp officers.

"Come on now, girls—give us a smile!"

Private Leary, who has been hitting the high spots over Sunday and is very sleepy this morning, has just been awakened by the train boy, who wants to sell him a booklet of camp views.

Bill has just overstayed his leave by twenty-four hours and is being coached on what to do. "Tell them your grandmother was took sick and you couldn't leave her. They'll fall for it."

"Hold it!"
